Re: “Islam and Economic Performance: Historical and Contemporary Links,” Journal of Economic Literature, Vol. 56, no. 4 (December 2018).

As the author of “Islam and Economic Performance: Historical and Contemporary Links,” I hereby declare that I have no relevant or material financial interests that relate to the research surveyed and critiqued in this paper.

During the period when I wrote this paper, I was employed by Duke University, received an honorarium from the College of Administrative Sciences at Koç University for a visiting research professorship, and received a research grant from the Berkley Center for Religion, Peace and World Affairs at Georgetown University. None of these organizations instructed me what to write, what sources to cover in the review, or how to interpret the literature. They all expected me to produce academic research.

Sincerely yours,
