Sins of Omission and the Practice of Economics

For the past three years, and while writing this article, I have received financial support as a Fellow of the Social Interactions, Identity and Well-Being Group of the Canadian Institute for Financial Research. There is no conflict of interest. This financial support was given to support scientific research without any conflict of interest.

I have also given consulting advice to a panel of the MacArthur Foundation. This advice concerned the relative merits of scientific and artistic work only with regard to the public good. It was not in any way related to the writing of this paper, and there is no possible conflict of interest.

My son, Robert J. Akerlof, received a research grant from INET (Institute for New Economic Thinking). Again there is no conflict of interest.

My wife, Janet L. Yellen, has been nominated to be President of the American Economic Review. Again there is no conflict of interest.
